

A close-up photograph of a green-painted wooden door. The paint is heavily peeling and cracked, revealing the underlying wood. The door has a grid pattern of raised panels. The lighting is dramatic, with deep shadows and bright highlights on the peeling paint.

TRACES

Kevin Graham

Smithereens Press

TRACES

Kevin Graham

Smithereens Press 17

TRACES

is first published by Smithereens Press <http://smithereenspress.com> on 7th September 2016.

Copyright © Kevin Graham.
All rights reserved.

Cover image © Neil Banks (<http://neilbanks.com/>)

Text set in Calibri 12 point.

smithereens.press@gmail.com

CONTENTS

Afterthought	3
Gemini	4
Traces	5
Swim	6
Seascape	7
Passerby	8
In the Woods	9
Derelict	10
The Bend	11
Exeunt	12

TRACES

Who ever made a ritual of cinders?

- Pablo Neruda, 'Sonata and Destructions'

Afterthought

i.m.

Before he died, before the stitches burst and he bled out on the hospital floor, he came and offered me snow in a dream.

He approached the task as in his life: resourceful, strong; blue hands working overtime, analysing the freshest pockets in the garden to hand me in big clumpy fistfuls.

‘The fuck are you doing?’ I said.
He smiled and pointed up at the sinking flakes, how they shouldered his coat, caught in his eyelashes, melting into tears.

A scratching noise made me turn towards a shadow hidden in the undergrowth.

The white was coming thick and fast and I was running out of words.

Gemini

Scooped like a prize into a white nest of coddled towels, nostrils flaring in the all-too-quick air, its release a map of panic and sudden sky, belly pushing up, squeezing in, lungs whirring into autopilot, as natural to the open world as a terrible minute later when they coaxed my lifeless twin, limp from asphyxiation, more bloody-blue than pink and in the silence I couldn't have known the memory of his foot trailing mine, my older brother, in his infant wisdom, having sensed my leaving first – the cord gripping his baby-neck – tapping me on the ankle to let me know there'd be a time when hunched over the side of the bed I'd be wrestling with a sock, my heart dipping like a robin, and I'd know.

Traces

There are things we used to do like drift under autumn's bright occasion, how death comes in a thousand colours, a single crushed reminder.

The air sharpens, tickles where neck and shoulder meet, loosening a bolt of shivers.
The morning's risen, the mile-long stream of traffic into town a slow-moving dream in which drivers contemplate their lives, unable to lift their heads in the direction of the park where a colonnade of oaks breaks sunlight into bars and flycatchers breakfast on the wing.

The memory of that morning will come back when, for reasons better known to yourself, you stepped out of the car like a movie star, an accuracy flooding in the margins, a warmth rising in the blood; all of your futures suddenly jabbering in unison.

Swim

I want to tell you – as the light goes out on another Dublin winter, the skint trees all wet with tears of rain – that I remember every detail of the morning you led me down the steps that summer, under a drove of sun-kissed orange groves, the dawn sky effervescent with possibility, light breaking the swaying plush of leaves, your eyes – those eyes I took to knowing as my own – still shiny from last night's burnt absinthe hallowed on your tongue, sober enough to tiptoe over stones before the Adriatic caressed our naked ankles, its furling waves a chemistry of joy I wanted to hold and have eclipse the full moon of my heart before crashing into foam, bubbles frothing open as we struggled for the currency of weight, my body keeling like a boat until you played Jesus and levelled me in your arms and – this is the only point I'm trying to make – the trapped echo I'd carried for so long, polished clean from nights of bitter calm, floated between both endless blues, drifted in a kind of miracle release: already memory, already a tipping point lifting in the past.

Seascape

(after Elizabeth Bishop)

This island, flat as a map, designed in the hierarchy of science that gives birth to plump red and green tomatoes, regimented fields of grapes. Little whirlwinds of flies floating in the air like lanterns after a spill of rain, the earth running to dark funnels. The seascape attracts a crowd, like a prophet, offering passers-by time to reflect on a better future. A pheasant soars over a mob of albino-white pigeons pecking uselessly in a field; the donkey goes unnoticed. Vines buried underground are like a mat of veins or the subterranean fire of the imagination. Crude electric fences hum along overgrown borders. Wildflowers offer up various shades of blood, illustrate with nodding heads the wind's predisposition. Petals trundle to kiss water. The path lifts with dust, settles on leaves like ash on an upturned palm. Kite surfers copycat on the spume, chase living memory or daylight, or both. Rock-pools wrestle with the unknown. A cat lands without a sound beside the drunken lighthouse-keeper who is tired of dreaming up perfect storms.

Passerby

There, boys crossed the line and became men.
That pitch of longing swims with lightning grass, has become a nesting ground for creatures that burrow, birds that flit. Jaded posts lean into a summer sky and dream of being touched again by the arc from a hopeful boot. We hold our breath and shield our eyes to catch the flight. The moon hovers forever in the distance. I see red flowers shake in the sigh of an acre gone to seed, rushing in the wind that brings back kisses from before when shivers crossed my spine like a wind chime.
The lines lie hidden, like our hearts, waiting for the parting grass to show what lay there.
What lies there still in the mind's occluded warren?

In the Woods

Leave your week at the fringes.
Here, there is only the prospect of your next step, the play of light and shade where tinges of memory surface as in that rope of goldcrests lifting beyond the treeline, grey squirrels spiralling over bark.

The earth rushes near the stream threading the deciduous dark you will enter like a teenager stumbling home and emerge again in open meadows where the sky spills with pent-up rain onto celandine, dog's mercury and spathes of lords-and-ladies. If you concentrate hard enough the red star of your heart will float from its chest and perch in a vault of emerald leaves, hidden nests, and a stag might approach, putting you in mind of Actaeon: how death didn't recognise his cries; all that brilliance going up in smoke, the poor hounds tearing out his eyes.

Derelict

Its battered-down doorway scuffed with dirt and decay, eyes cracked windows into a darkness harbouring the sweat of old furniture, its stench a fine must of squatting insects, animals clambering through its lightless rooms, the cold walls of its lungs exhaling like a death under the apex of its caved-in roof, where, upstairs, the sky openly loomed, wrapping air along its rotting beams, swishing in the attic of forgotten dreams, brushing up even the smallest fallen stars.

The Bend

Compelled to return to the spot where shadows infiltrate the light and flowers spread their petals like confetti. The path has ridges, footprints – comings and goings.
We are not the first ones here.

Nightjars and stock doves permeate the woody air, trigger eyes in a way that makes memory rock to time's unforgiving hands.
If we could see around the corner the lost river might show its face, a stone bridge lead us gratefully into silence. Here is life like a butterfly in perpetual atmosphere, flitting one way, then another. Here is the stir of the heart understanding the grace in never really knowing.

Exeunt

"If I have been worried or sad during the day it often calms me to recall childhood memories."

- Ingmar Berman, 'Wild Strawberries' (1957)

(i)

The past has been looking through the present's tilted blinds, out into a world where faces drift like feathers up a stream. We skip to the all-consuming dream and live beyond the voice.
There, daylight gives meaning to the sodden leaves and shredded plastic nestled at the kerb, the pools of drenched gold shining in the sun, on the road, along railway tracks where a boy once stood like a secret in the dark imagining his vanishing point, a slight but constant tremble rising in his throat – the way a bristle of corncrakes makes us stir – struck like a tuning fork, honest as a ghost, waiting to see what would happen.

(ii)

Sorrow in the air, in the water. Behind seaweedclumps our clothes in neat little piles. Belongings.
We don't touch each other's skin but we are free again, as if unborn, swimming in mother's will. You are not my twin but I see you in the twisted eye I fix over my shoulder on weak days, days weak enough to burst like the bubbles streaming from my mouth now that I'm under exploring the blur.

See-through fish rifle past like lightning, disappear in the silvery gloom. My limbs are shipwreckheavy but the planet is finally opening up the way a drowning man makes light of the dark or the way we cling to expectation.

(iii)

Running in wheat fields with a friend's homebrew sloshing in grubby brown bottles.
We uncover a wartime concrete bunker and taste the here-and-now with its snickering stalks and overlaid hush that runs to a great and glittering blue. A clutch of perfumed girls stops to talk, aflame with sex.
A blackbird hovers low enough to touch.

Some pair off, slip into bushes emerging red-faced, shook. Others are too awkward in their skin to be taken in. One looks away, takes out a Zippo and holds its flame to dried-up leaves.
Weird sparks tremble in his eyes.
We read about him later in the paper.

(iv)

An unbearable truth when the front door opens, rows of jaded saplings on their knees. A homesick recollection of dinner parties and parents laughing with friends at Christmas; the butchery of turkey. Black wine-stained teeth still furnish a glow but don't ease the strain of her telling you with bowed, moonstruck eyes about the abortion. A blizzard of questions under skies leading to the deep, darkness running amok.

You lay a hand on the rail and come away in a stain of rust. The drop beyond whispers at your feet. A wall of cries tramples in off the waves. Summer ends. A heart stops.

(v)

The black-winged waters listen, little waves sewn with broken light that build before dissolving under night's victory.

A seagull flares in the dark. Here is nature's hologram: the ethereal quality of truth and love, panic and guilt.

On the boardwalk, a shadow swings its head as the first legion of rain marches in.

(vi)

The innate swell of something intimate spilling up from the depths. The night says touch me but you're seeing stars warm to frozen pools of trapped seawater.

You're smoking and you don't smoke. Someone's made a fire out of driftwood and memory.
Most are on drugs: pot, pills, nothing hard.
Tall tales circumnavigate the glow: nostalgia blossoms when you're this loaded.

The kick doesn't come as a surprise so much as calculation, the moored boats tinkering in their sleep a loose metaphor for tetheredness.

(vii)

A universe rising in the chest. The blink from misery to unseemly blue a déjà vu that keeps coming back, keeps coming back.
A lightness in the blood to compare with autumn mountain walks when oak and ash are a hundred shades of gold and breath implies the one sure thing. Wet footprints have followed you to this spot where anemones clutter rock pools and crabs nudge sideways from the light. There is only the reflection of all we cannot see and, as if made of stone, your own frightened look.

Acknowledgements

Many thanks to the editors of the following publications where some of these poems first appeared: Crannog, Galway Review, Oxford Poetry, Poetry Ireland Review, Poetry Salzburg, Southword, The Stinging Fly, The SHOp.

Kevin Graham lives and works in Dublin. He graduated from DCU with a BSc in Applied Computational Linguistics and his poems have appeared in various magazines and journals, as well as radio. He was selected for the 2012 Poetry Ireland Introductions Series and in 2014 was shortlisted for a Hennessey Literary Award. He has received two bursaries in literature from An Chomhairle Ealaíon / The Arts Council, Ireland and he was featured poet in Issue 28 of The Stinging Fly. He is working towards his first collection.

<http://smithereenspress.com>

smithereens.press@gmail.com